I take a lot of photos of myself.

No, I do.

525 selfies on a phone that I've had for 6 months.

A lot-- and most of them won't make it to your feed (even posted, the odds of more than eighty-odd of my five hundred instagram followers double-tapping for that red heart POP are lower than I'd like to believe). Perhaps I consider these self(ie) portraits a trail of myself, time capsules of the days when I do wear that blue eyeshadow or city transports back to the beach house mirror (and sand-chapped thighs). And then, perhaps these are the traces of that pink-eyed vanity they say has consumed this generation of teenage girls. With cell-phone in hand -- and four bars of service, god willing -- we've crossed the stratosphere and overshot our egos into moon-cheese manifestations. I'm getting ahead of myself.

There are weeks when I take a photo of myself every day. (In the first semester of my sophomore year, heartbreak and the tumblr girl lifestyle (double quotations to remind you newbies that this is what would now be referred to as the VSCO girl lifestyle, or ever worse, the actions of a Tik Tok influencer), I took a photo of myself every morning that I had a panic attack before first period. Mascara salt-streaks and all. I keep them on my phone to reference if (when) I start to forget the appearance of my own face (this happens sometimes when you don't love the way you look. Maybe that's what this is, a start to a change).

There are happy pictures. Pretty pictures. Smiles, frowns, and pouts. Ugly photos. Photos with Billie Eilish eyes. Fake giddy shots. Group selfies.

And a lot of vanity. If you hadn't picked up on that yet.
